Recruitment and Selection

Hiring process

Recruitment normally includes role approval, sourcing, screening, interviews, selection, reference or background checks where applicable, offer approval, and onboarding handover.

Selection decisions should be based on role requirements, evidence from the hiring process, and consistent evaluation criteria.

Interview records

Interview feedback should be factual, role-related, and recorded through approved recruitment systems. Sensitive personal information should not be included unless required for a legitimate process.

Background Verification

Verification

Where applicable, background verification may cover identity, employment history, education, or other role-relevant checks. The scope is communicated through the applicable process.

Discrepancies are reviewed by authorized HR personnel and may require clarification from the candidate or employee.

Confidentiality

Verification records are restricted to authorized personnel and retained according to the company's record-management requirements.

Probation and Confirmation

Standard process

The standard probation period for permanent employees is six months unless the appointment letter specifies otherwise. Managers should provide feedback before the probation end date.

Possible outcomes include confirmation, extension with documented reasons, or separation in accordance with applicable terms and requirements.

Documentation

Confirmation decisions should be communicated in writing and recorded in the HR system. Managers should not promise confirmation before the formal process is completed.

Attendance Administration

Records

Attendance and leave records should reflect actual working time and approved absence. Managers should address repeated discrepancies promptly.

Employees should not alter records to conceal lateness, absence, or overtime.

Correction

Employees can request correction of an attendance record through the HR support process. Supporting evidence may be required.

Performance Management

Goal setting

Goals should be agreed between employee and manager, aligned with team priorities, and measurable where practical.

Managers should document meaningful feedback, especially where performance is below expectations.

Performance improvement

Where sustained performance concerns exist, the company may use a structured improvement plan with defined expectations, support, review dates, and outcomes.

The purpose is to clarify expectations and provide a fair opportunity to improve, while protecting business needs.

Internal Mobility

Transfers

Employees may apply for internal roles subject to eligibility, business requirements, manager discussion, and the receiving team's selection process.

Transfer timing should account for project commitments and reasonable handover requirements.

Promotion

Promotions are based on sustained performance, demonstrated scope, role requirements, and available organizational opportunities. Tenure alone does not guarantee promotion.

Workplace Conduct

Expected behaviour

Employees must act respectfully, protect company resources, avoid conflicts of interest, and follow security and confidentiality requirements.

Concerns involving harassment, discrimination, threats, retaliation, or serious misconduct should be escalated through the appropriate channel.

Conflict of interest

Employees should disclose situations where personal, family, financial, or external interests could influence company decisions. The company may implement mitigation measures or restrictions.

Grievance Handling

Initial resolution

Where safe and appropriate, employees may raise concerns with their manager or HR. Serious or sensitive matters may bypass the normal reporting line.

HR records the concern, identifies the appropriate process, gathers relevant information, and communicates next steps where possible.

Non-retaliation

Good-faith complaints and participation in investigations should not result in retaliation. Suspected retaliation should be reported promptly.

Employee Records

Record accuracy

HR maintains employment records such as joining information, role history, compensation records, leave, performance documentation, and approved changes.

Employees should keep contact and banking information current through approved systems.

Access

Employee records are accessible only to authorized personnel with a legitimate business need.

Policy Governance

Version control

Policies have owners, effective dates, versions, and review cycles. Employees should use the latest approved version from the internal knowledge portal.

Managers should not create informal policy changes that conflict with controlled documents.

Review

Policies are reviewed periodically and when there is a material business, operational, or regulatory change.

Manager Responsibilities

Core responsibilities

Managers are responsible for communicating expectations, approving requests consistently, addressing performance issues early, protecting employee confidentiality, and escalating matters they are not authorized to resolve.

Managers should avoid giving legal interpretations and should involve HR when a situation has significant policy, employee-relations, or compliance implications.

Frequently Asked Questions

Is probation automatically confirmed after six months?

No. Confirmation, extension, or separation is determined through the applicable documented process.

Can tenure alone result in promotion?

No. Promotion considers performance, scope, role requirements, and organizational opportunities.

Who can access employee records?

Only authorized personnel with a legitimate business need.

Can a manager create a different leave entitlement for one employee?

Managers should not create informal policy changes. Exceptions require the appropriate HR approval.

What should I do about a workplace concern?

Use your manager, HR, or the designated reporting channel depending on the nature and sensitivity of the concern.
